

Creative & Critical Paradigm Shifts in Environment & Society

Individual Evaluation of Contribution to Exhibition

During the exhibition, I was part of the Promotions and Marketing Group. The reason I chose this group is that my major is Public Relations and Advertising, so I believed that the responsibilities of this group would closely align with my academic background: planning, promoting, and disseminating relevant information for our final exhibition. In fact, this turned out to be exactly the case.

There were nine members in our group. At the beginning of the project, we created a group chat where we all discussed the exhibition theme and got to know each other via WhatsApp. Following that, we held an online meeting on Zoom to discuss the overall tasks we needed to complete and to assign responsibilities. We also created a shared document on Google Docs titled “Comms and Promotion Plan,” which allowed all members to collaboratively work on the planning document.

The main task I was responsible for was identifying potential invitees, who were divided into individuals and organizations. After finalizing the list, the next step was to collect their contact information, primarily email addresses. This task was completed in collaboration with Jessie.

After that, we held another online meeting to further clarify each team member’s responsibilities and set final task deadlines. I worked with another group member, Xinyao, on several tasks: composing emails to contact organizations, drafting 5–6 interview questions for Interview Reel 1, drafting captions and teaser 1, and contributing to later drafting stages as well as some post-event tasks.

During the process, due to scheduling conflicts between Jessie and me, we exchanged some of our assigned duties—she completed part of my work, and I sent out all the invitation emails on her behalf. As the project progressed, I noticed a challenge: Xinyao and I were sometimes unclear about what the other had completed. This occasionally led to confusion—at times, we both thought the other had done a task and it was left unfinished, or we both did it and duplicated the work unnecessarily. To solve this, I proposed that we further refine our division of tasks and assign specific responsibilities to individuals (For more details, please refer to the appendix 1). Xinyao fully agreed. I then restructured our task assignments and created a clearer schedule. This greatly improved our workflow, and we continued progressing according to the updated plan.

Through this experience, I learned the importance of frequent communication with teammates and how breaking tasks down into smaller, clearly defined responsibilities can significantly increase efficiency. Following the post-event plan, I also created a feedback survey based on the exhibition and wrote thank-you emails to participants once the event had concluded. I also worked with Bader to select the background music for the video we posted on Instagram.

On the day of the exhibition, I was responsible for putting up posters around the campus—not with my original group members, but with new friends I had met during the course. We brought posters and tape, and walked around the campus searching for suitable places to hang them in order to promote the exhibition and attract visitors (For more details, please refer to the appendix 2).

There were six of us girls, chatting and laughing while we worked together, sharing candy and drinking coffee. It was a fun and enjoyable experience. During our conversations, we got to know each other better and formed closer relationships.

Although this course has ended along with the semester, I will never forget the friends I made during this journey.

Through this project, I gained so much. Initially, I thought working together on an exhibition would be very challenging, especially since we didn't know each other well. The task seemed overwhelming. But once we divided the big task into smaller parts and everyone completed their own responsibilities on time, I saw how powerful teamwork could be.

Another key lesson I learned was the importance of timely and clear communication within a group. Eliminating information gaps is essential to improving efficiency.

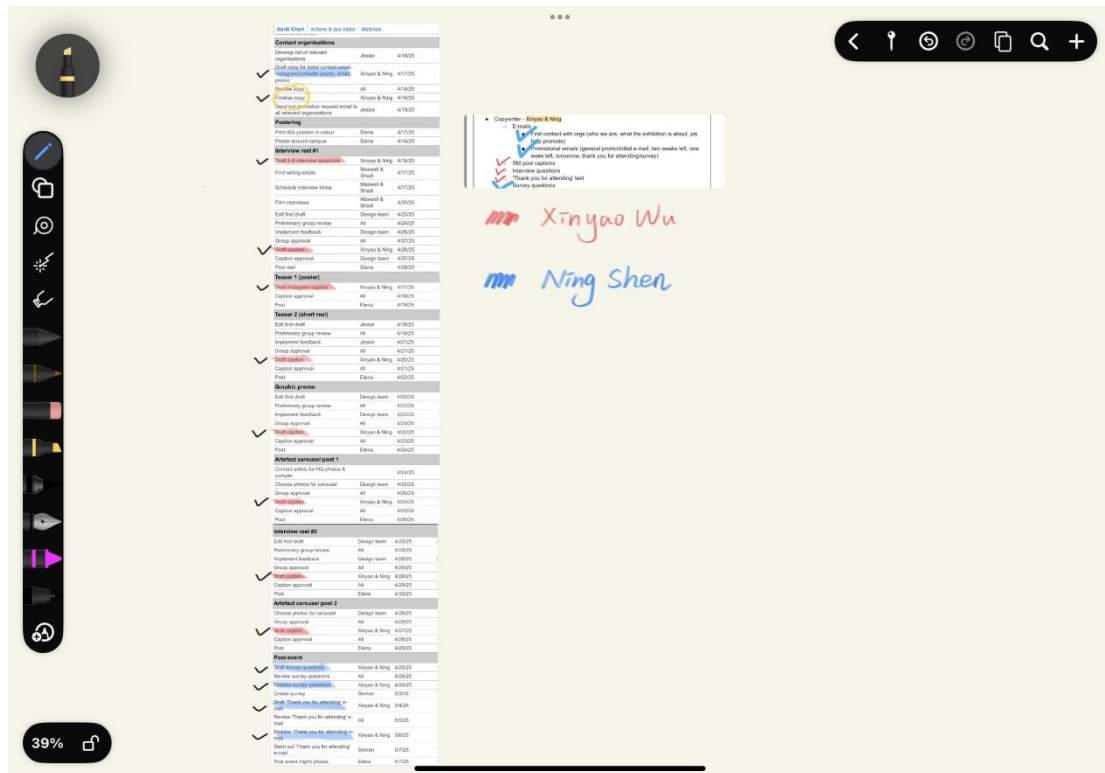

Most importantly, I gained friendship and joy—especially with Jessie. From her, I learned the value of striving for excellence in everything you do, and that's something I'll always remember.

In conclusion, I'm very grateful that I chose this course, and I feel proud to have contributed to the exhibition. Thank you to Tania, my classmates, my teammates, and to myself—for all the effort and dedication I put in!

Appendix

Appendix 1:

The updated task schedule that Xinyao and I created after reorganizing our division of work.

Appendix 2: The group photo we took after putting up the posters on the day of the exhibition is something I will treasure forever—it's a beautiful reminder of the joyful collaboration we shared as a team of girls.